LAST SUNDAY AFTER EPIPHANY

REFLECTION

Often on the last Sunday of the season after Epiphany we celebrate the Feast of the Transfiguration, but this year I thought I might use the readings for the day instead. They're not the easiest to preach on - using the ones for the Transfiguration would definitely be more comfortable – but that's the point. If we only look at the parts of scripture that are comfortable, we don't allow ourselves to be challenged and to deepen our faith through coming to grips with these passages. So, this Sunday we are looking at the Sermon on the Mount in Matthew 5. Not the Beatitudes, which everyone loves, but the parts where Jesus applies the heart of the law to the heart and mind of the believer and calls us to account, not just for our outward dealings with others, but the attitude of our thoughts. Looking at these moral and ethical issues through the lens of the heart and mind brings us into a place where we have to look carefully in the mirror at how we are thinking and feeling towards others and what we need to do about that. In these words Jesus talks about anger and hatred, about lust and adultery, about divorce, and integrity in our promises to one another and the Lord. The essence of these things is in our heart for the Lord and our love for one another. We who have chosen to live in love the way the Father loves us need also to work through the issues of human failings. Paul says in 1 Corinthians 13 that love does no wrong to another, but we can have a hard time sometimes fulfilling that. People do not always behave this way with us, and we do not always do so with them. We have to work through our differences in healthy ways, but the unhealthy ways to do things are often only a word/thought/action away. I love that Jesus didn't skim over the hard stuff of life. I love that he knew what it was to be human and live through the things we face daily. That means he speaks from understanding and we can trust his grace is here.
